IV. Reading comprehension:

There were few Chinese in Taiwan even in 1590, when the Portuguese navigators found the island and called it Formosa ('beautiful'), the name by which it became known in the Western world. In 1622, the Dutch established a military base on the Pescadores, just southwest of Taiwan, and in 1624 they built Fort Zeelandia on the island itself, just outside today's Tainan city. After routing the Spanish settlements from the northern part of the island, the Dutch expanded their garrison and used Taiwan as a trading center.

The rule of the Dutch ended in 1661, when the forces of Cheng Ch'eng-kung (Koxinga), the famous Ming loyalist, defeated them. The regime established by Cheng lasted until 1683, when troops under the Ch'ing Emperor K'ang-hsi crushed Cheng's grandson. For the next two hundred years, the Ch'ing state administered the island like any other prefectures, but anti-Ch'ing sentiment united around the memory of Koxinga persisted.

By the late seventeenth century, the Mainland was experiencing a population explosion. Emigrants from Fukien and Kwantung provinces sailed illegally to Taiwan, founding villages and market towns in the arable western plains. After the 1720s, emigration accelerated because the Ch'ing court no longer tried to enforce the laws against it. Settlements then spread to the north and east of the island.

Most people like living with other people. But some people just have to be by themselves. Take Bozo Kuick, for example. For over eighty-four years Bozo lived all alone on a desert island.

In 1888, when Bozo was only sixteen, his father left him on a little island off the coast of Croatia. He kissed Bozo goodbye and said, "I hope all goes well with you, my son." Then the father got back in his boat and sailed home without his son. How could he do such a thing, you ask? Well, Bozo had asked him to.

Bozo's father was a poor peasant who couldn't afford to feed his seven children. So he called his sons together and asked them to decide their own future. Bozo chose the life of a hermit.

During the years that Bozo lived alone, World Wars I and II were fought. But Bozo never heard about them. In 1972, a crew of fishermen visited his island. They tried to talk to Bozo. At first the old hermit ran away. Finally, he let the men into his windowless stone hut.

The fishermen talked with Bozo for over two hours. They told him all about the two World Wars he had missed. When they asked his age, Bozo guessed he was one hundred years old.

They asked if he wanted to go home. But Bozo said no. So the fishermen wished Bozo well and left him alone again—just as his father had eighty-four years before.
