Longshan Temple, built in 1738, is located in Wanhua, Taipei. It is one of Taipei's most famous and busiest temples and finest examples of Taiwan's historical, architectural, and artistic heritage. Due to natural disaster and damages caused by humans, the temple has been restored several times. Its trove includes priceless paintings, carvings, and other skilled work of great artistic value. It is regarded as one of the oldest and resplendent Buddhist temples in Taiwan.

In Longshan Temple, there are three halls lined up back to back with the main hall in the middle of the temple complex, and two covered galleries running down either side. In total, the modular space is composed of 11 units. The complex sports a classical hipped roof with double-eave style. The restored façade wall is constructed of stones hauled all the way from Mt. Guanyin on the north coast along the Tamsui River. As with many East Asian temples, it has three decorated gates, one inside the next. In the first courtyard is a waterfall stand, a point of ablution. Carved, richly painted dragons guard the entrances. The main hall was built with bronze dragons on right and left pillars symbolizing protections to the hall, and decorations of delicate sculptures, detailed wood carvings and gorgeous buddha statues settle in the main chamber with an explosion of brilliant color.

The temple is settled north facing south, worshipping the Guanshiyin Buddha and other divine spirits. Religious devotees, local believers, and general tourists come in great numbers, especially during the Lunar New Year period. It is an important place of worship and historical value.

Culinary tourism is one of the hottest trends in travel. Simply put, culinary tourism is the act of traveling to find great food, which includes any experience where tourists learn about, appreciate, consume, or indulge in food or drinks that reflect the local culture. While some people travel to see historic sights or hit the road in search of boutiques and souvenirs, more and more people are getting bit by the culinary travel bug. It is not hard to see why; culinary tourism allows visitors to engage in a sensory, artistic expression of a destination’s culture. Experts estimate interest in gastronomic tours will increase more than 16 percent a year for the next ten years.

Whether people plan to travel solely for delicious eats or just hope to pepper some delectable restaurants into their itinerary, culinary tourism is essential to modern travel. Culinary tourism isn’t solely about tourists’ food or the luxurious restaurants they splurge on. Instead, it’s about eating adventurously and seeking out novel culinary experiences. The further the distance traveled, the more comprehensive the range of culinary opportunities.

Culinary tourism is a cornerstone of the modern travel industry. It directly contributes to both the hospitality industry and the overall economy. The development of food culture can help a tourist destination draw new visitors. Since food often reflects an entire nation's eating habits, culinary tourism can teach visitors valuable cultural lessons. Countries are often associated with particular foods—people will travel across the world to eat the best pizza in Italy or the best ramen in Japan. Every country and culture is an opportunity to try new and different foods. Culinary tourists are eager to learn more about different cultures through their foods.

Travel has been trending increasingly towards authentic experiences. A recent report from World Food Travel found that 81 percent of surveyed tourists believe that local food helps them understand the culture of their travel destination. Eighty-two percent admit to spending more on food while on vacation than at home. Eighty-three percent say food helps create a lasting impression of a country. People are more eager than ever to connect with the real roots of their visiting places. Food is always a significant aspect of any trip—no matter how tired tourists might be, they're going to sit down and have something to eat. And if they dine at a restaurant and enjoy local street food, they're likely to take photos and capture the experience to share with friends. Looking back on their trip, they'll never forget the food they tasted and the adventure surrounding it.

- 76 Which of the following best describes the purpose of this passage?
- (A) To provide evidence showing how food is more important than the economy.
  - (B) To demonstrate the significance of the travelers' culinary skills in cooking.
  - (C) To interpret how authentic and well-cooked local foods may win tourists' hearts.
  - (D) To compromise the value of domestic food in popular travel destinations.
- 77 According to the passage, which of the following is true?
